MONDAY EVENING, JULY 23.

Letter from Warrenton.
[Correspondence of the Alexandria Gazette.]
WARRENTON, July 22.—There are comparatively very few visitors here this year, though the incoming train brings a fresh accession every day. The town is rather dull even at this season of the year, and society goes along quietly enough.
As for politics, there is enough in this small town alone to supply a moderate sized city, and the inhabitants generally pass their time in sitting on dry goods boxes in the streets discussing the claims of each rival candidate, rarely moving except to keep in the shade as the sun circles around in the heavens, its beams invading their retreat and making a glaring white heat where there was coolness before. Of course Fauquier is solid for Lee, for many of the people hereabouts were old cavaliers under the redoubtable Fitz, and want to see such a good fellow get a high reward. He certainly has a host of staunch friends, and they swear by him. It is well known that that cavalry leader has all those attributes that men like; he is a reckless dash about him him that is exceedingly captivating; none can tell a sweet little episode or roaring camp anecdote with more vim and fire than he, and as for a song, ask any veteran cavalryman if Fitz can sing, and he will tell you of many a jovial chant that floated down the river on the picket line, or the tender ballad that awoke the silence of the mountain gorges during the midnight march to the front, when the sootiest resonant tones of the gayest cavalier of the grand army could always be heard above the others leading the chorus.
If the General fails to get a full vote in the convention, then Fauquier will divide the upper portion of the county being in favor of Hilditch, and the lower strong for Daniel. In the event of a dead lock among the absolute necessity of choosing a compromise man, Gen. Wm. Payne, of this county, would receive a powerful support from all sections of the State. He is one of those men whom nature fashioned when in a royally generous mood, and endowed with a lavish hand her favorite son. A man of high honor, noble purposes, and brilliant mind, a gallant soldier, a splendid speaker. He is that type of manhood that a mob would c
